Village, a place where even the building have a rich history. Each of the 40+ buildings have their own story of a past life in another place and time.

In the late 1950's, the town of New Egypt lost their local farmers market. Esler (Les) Heller had just returned from serving in the Navy and noticed that the vendors were looking for a new market. It was then that Mr. Heller decided to use the land near his home as a new venue for livestock auctions and produce sales. Soon after opening his new market in 1959, Mr. Heller added tables for second hand and antique sales and The New Egypt Flea Market Village was alive and thriving.

In the late sixties, Mr. Heller began bringing in buildings. One by one they arrived from towns throughout central and southern New Jersey. Many of the buildings were destined for demolition, but he preserved them by bringing them into the market and giving them a new purpose. He laid them out in a village setting with dirt roads. The last of the buildings arrived in the mid 1970's and nearly all the buildings are still standing today.

Among the buildings is approximately sixteen WWII era army barracks purchased from Fort Dix. Once home to soldiers, the barracks now house everything from a furniture store to a food pantry. The market has three rows, or roads. The back road has a dozen old barracks each painted a different color. Most of the barracks are section off into two independently run shops.

Another four barracks are located on the front road, one of which was painted with a patriotic American flag mural. Visible from the road, it has become the most iconic building in the village.

Along the front road also stands the oldest school house from a nearby town. A century ago, its one room taught reading, writing and arithmetic. Now, as Glen's Hut, it's spent nearly two decades housing Southwestern American treasures and other historical items.

The school's red exterior is long gone, replaced with a bright yellow. Who choose that color and why someone would paint an old school house yellow remains a mystery. But that's the way it is here. Each shop owner adds their own touch to each building and as the years pass the unique characteristics of each one grows.

Unusual colors are typical here at the market. Towards the end of the front road stand three old officer's quarters, also purchased from Fort Dix. One, a baby blue with cedar shakes, is home to Everything Under the Sun and Moon. It's neighbor, a pastel pink building, is the home of the Poetry & Arts Barn, which hosts poetry readings and writing workshops.

Not all the buildings have a military and educational background. The second road has more than a dozen and a half buildings with an exciting past. They came from a variety of resorts and camps that were popular decades ago. Think of the movie Dirty Dancing. That's the type of resorts where these buildings once stood. When the heyday for those resorts came to an end, Mr. Heller saved many of the cottages from destruction by bringing them to the village. Now, they're filled with antiques, collectables, refurbished furniture, and vintage items.

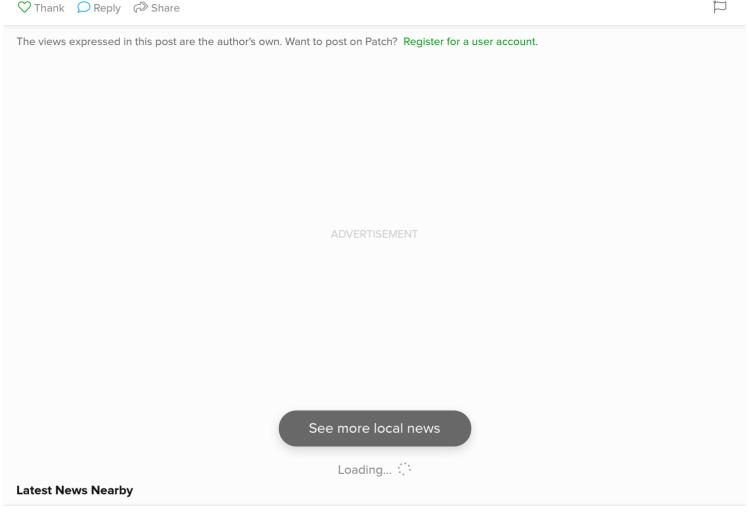

One of the most unusual buildings is the office. Its past life was a Dairy Queen. But now it plays double duty as manager (Mr. Heller's son-in-law) Keith Warner.

In total, there's more than forty historical buildings in the New Egypt Flea Market Village and even more unique shops. The market is located at 933 Monmouth Rd (RT 537), Cream Ridge, NJ, 08527 and is open every Wednesday and Sunday, year-round from 8 am to 2 pm.
